Sadly, some teachers consider grades or reporting forms their "weapon of last resort." In their view, students who do not comply with their requests must suffer the consequences of the greatest punishment a teacher can bestow: a failing grade.

(A) Recognizing this, some schools have initiated grading policies that eliminate the use of failing grades altogether. Teachers at Beachwood Middle School in Beachwood, Ohio, for example, record students' grades as A, B, C or I (Incomplete). Students who receive an I grade are required to do additional work in order to bring their performance up to an acceptable level.

(B) This policy is based on the belief that students perform at a failure level or submit failing work in large part because teachers accept it. The Beachwood teachers reason that if they no longer accept substandard work, students will not submit it. And with appropriate support, they believe students will continue to work until their performance is satisfactory.

(C) Such practices have no educational value and, in the long run, adversely affect students, teachers, and the relationship they share. Rather than attempting to punish students with a low grade or mark in the hope it will encourage them to give greater effort in the future, teachers can better motivate students by considering their work as incomplete and then requiring additional effort.

(B) In-Guen Park, an English teacher of MyongJi high school, assigned an English essay to his students as homework. He made several standards by which he would evaluate the essays. Arin, one of In-Guen's favorite students, submitted her essay. Sadly, In-Geun noticed that her essay was far below the standards. He decided to give her the lowest grade, without giving another chance of revision.
