Say you're pushing for a clean water act.

Everyone's heard the expression don't let the perfect become the enemy of the good. (A) If you want to get over an obstacle so that your idea can become the solution-based policy you've long dreamed of, you can't have an all-or-nothing mentality. You have to be willing to alter your idea and let others influence its outcome. (B) You have to be okay with the outcome being a little different, even a little less, than you wanted. (C) Even if what emerges isn't as well-funded as you wished, or doesn't match how you originally conceived the bill, you'll have still succeeded in ensuring that kids in troubled areas have access to clean water. That's what counts, that they will be safer because of your idea and your effort. (D) Is it perfect? No. Is there more work to be done? Absolutely. (E) But in almost every case, helping move the needle forward is vastly better than not helping at all.
