Vegetarian eating is moving into the mainstream as more and more young adults say no to meat, poultry, and fish. According to the American Dietetic Association, "approximately planned vegetarian diets are healthful, are nutritionally adequate, and provide health benefits in the prevention and treatment of certain diseases." But health concerns are not the only reason that young adults give for changing their diets. There are some young adults who make the choice out of concern for animal rights. When faced with the statistics that show the majority of animals raised as food live in confinement, many teens give up meat to protest those conditions. Others turn to vegetarianism to support the environment. Meat production uses vast amounts of water, land, grain, and energy and creates problems with animal waste and resulting pollution.

- ① I switched to a plant-based diet because it can reduce the needless suffering and deaths of countless animals that are raised in the horrors of factory farming.
- ② I chose a vegetarian diet, which can reduce the destruction of rainforests that are vital to life on earth. People cut down trees to make room to raise cows.
- ③ I refuse to eat meat to save precious resources consumed to raise animals. It is reported that up to about 19,000 liters of water is required to get a half kilogram of beef!
- ④ I decided to remove animal products from my diet after I learned that chickens are kept in tight cages where they can't even spread their wings for their entire lives.
- ⑤ I adopted a vegetarian diet because it is healthier and can prevent diseases. I know that vegetarians have a reduced risk of heart diseases, obesity and lung cancer.
