If you were at a social gathering in a large building and you overheard someone say that “the roof is on fire,” what would be your reaction? Until you knew more information, your first inclination might be toward safety and survival. But if you were to find out that this particular person was talking about a song called “The Roof Is on Fire,” your feelings of threat and danger would be (A)[aroused / banished]. So once the additional facts are understood — that the person was referring to a song and not a real fire — the context is better understood and you are in a (B) [better / worse] position to judge and react. All too often people react far too quickly and emotionally over information without establishing context. It is so important for us to identify context related to information because if we are (C)[successful / unsuccessful] in doing so, we may judge and react too quickly.
