[올림포스1 15-1]

Our instincts tell us the higher we climb up the ladder, the more stress we feel and the weaker our feeling of safety. Consider the stereotype of the high-strung executive facing relentless pressure from shareholders, employees and the firm's largest customers.

(A) Known collectively as the Whitehall Studies, the studies' findings were both astounding and profound. Researchers found that workers' stress was not caused by a higher degree of responsibility and pressure usually associated with rank.

(B) We are hardly surprised when one of them suddenly drops dead of a heart attack before fifty. Decades ago, scientists in Britain set out to study this link between an employee's place on the corporate ladder and stress.

(C) It is not the demands of the job that cause the most stress, but the lack of control workers feel they have throughout their day.

(D) The studies also found that the effort required by a job is not in itself stressful, but rather the imbalance between the effort we give and the reward we feel.
